INTRODUCTION

When the Allies invaded Normandy on D-Day, the 6th of June 1944, US Army Air Forces (USAAF) engineers were among those in the initial assault waves. Their mission was to rapidly construct forward operating airfields, known as Advanced Landing Grounds (ALGs), on the continent. As the Allied armies advanced across France and into Germany, several hundred airfields were built or rehabilitated for use by the allied air forces. For security reasons, the airstrips were referred to by a coded number instead of location. In the United Kingdom, USAAF installations were identified by three digit (AAF) numbers ranging from AAF-101 to AAF-925.* After D-Day, continental airfields in the European Theater of Operations (ETO) were also assigned coded numbers. American airfields were given A-, Y-, or R-, prefixes and numbered consecutively from 1 to 99. British airfields on the continent were also consecutively numbered, but with a B-prefix.

The bulk of primary source material dealing with USAAF activities in Western Europe refers to the various airfields only by code number, thereby making it difficult or impossible to identify an airfield without a reference key. This guide is intended to bridge this difficulty.

Unlike the permanent airfields built in the United Kingdom and designed for the strategic bombardment of Germany, airfields on the continent were temporary, often improvised airfields to be used by the tactical air forces to support the advancing ground armies engaged on the battlefield. To provide the maximum close air support for the invasion force, it was desirable for the tactical forces to be based within one hundred miles of the front lines.¹ Since the battle lines could change dozens of miles in a single day, the requirement was for a mobile air force that could rapidly construct and occupy airfields and keep pace with the advancing troops.

*For a comprehensive listing of AAF codes, see Capt Barry J. Anderson's Army Air Forces Stations, A Guide to the Stations Where U.S. Army Air Forces Personnel Served in the United Kingdom During World War II, published by the Research Division, USAF Historical Research Center, Maxwell AFB, Alabama, 31 January 1985.

This responsibility was placed in the hands of USAAF's Ninth Air Force and its specially created engineering arm, the IX Engineer Command. Each aviation engineer battalion in the command (of a total of sixteen) was composed of sufficient men and equipment to quickly construct an airfield or landing ground* for a single tactical fighter or bomb group unit. Based on the experience obtained in the North African and Italian campaigns, fighter groups required an airfield 120 feet x 3600 feet long, and fighter-bomber groups required fields 120 feet x 5000 feet long (Figure 1). Medium bomb groups required 120 feet x 6000 feet runways (Figure 2). Instead of using rough, unimproved dirt strips, engineers used surfacing material necessary to strengthen the soil to support the weight of the aircraft and as a measure of insurance against the wet weather.²

The surfacing material selected for the building of advanced landing grounds during the first weeks after the Normandy invasion was known as square-mesh track (SMT). SMT, a British development, was material composed of heavy

*Technically, the term "landing ground" signified a landing area without an all weather runway and with incomplete facilities. When facilities were completed or an all weather runway was constructed, the landing area was to be called an "airfield." It was common practice, however, for the generic term "airfield" to be used regardless of the technical status of the landing area.

wire joined in three-inch squares. It was chosen over other surfacing materials because it was very lightweight, allowing sufficient quantities to be transported across the English channel on overtasked landing craft.³ Easily workable, a SMT landing mat for fighters could be layed like a carpet in about one week.

On D-Day, engineer aviation battalions stormed ashore alongside US Army infantry battalions and headed toward preselected sites to build airfields. Before the end of the day, an emergency landing strip was completed at Poupeville and by 8 June a transport field was constructed at St Laurent sur Mer (A-21), thus becoming the first wartime American airfield in the continental ETO. Construction continued at a rapid pace on other fields using SMT. Several of these fields were initially used by Ninth Air Force groups on a "roulement" basis. Fighters based in England could be refueled and rearmed at the forward field, conduct their missions and then return to England if greater maintenance services were required.⁴

In mid-June 1944, in the absence of German fighter opposition, the Ninth Air Force decided to use its fighters in a fighter-bomber role, thus requiring all planned fighter fields on the continent be built as 120 feet x 5000 feet fighter-bomber strips. Although this created some SMT supply difficulties, by the end of June 1944, eight Ninth Air Force fighter groups were conducting tactical bombing missions from ten operational airfields in the Normandy beachhead.⁵

After the initial batch of airfields was completed using SMT, the Army aviation engineers switched almost exclusively to another surfacing material known as prefabricated hessian (burlap) surfacing (PHS or PBS). Light and easily transportable, PHS did not create the dust problem encountered with SMT fields. Made of an asphalt-impregnated jute delivered in rolls 300 feet in length and 36 inches or 43 inches in width, PHS was layed in overlapping layers to produce a dust-free fair weather surface.⁶ It was also common to build airstrips using both SMT and PHS, laying SMT on top.

To provide an all season durable airfield for the Ninth Air Force's medium and light bombers, a third type of surfacing material known as pierced steel plank (PSP)*, was introduced on the Normandy bridgehead in July 1944. It consisted of 10 feet long, 15 inch wide steel planks joined together and layed perpendicular to the line of flight. Long used in other theaters, PSP would have been ideal for all airfields on the continent, but its limited availability and greater weight made this impractical. Moreover, because of supply problems, construction of even a PSP fighter-bomber field could take a month or longer, while similar PHS and SMT fields could be constructed in two weeks and one week, respectively.⁷

By the end of July 1944, all but three of the Ninth Air Force's twenty fighter groups were based on the SMT and PHS-constructed advanced landing grounds on the continent.⁸ The rapid advance of the Allied armies following the breakout through the Normandy hedgerow country produced a new rush of airfield construction as the tactical air force units sought to keep pace with the advancing armies. This breakthrough period, which lasted from late July to mid-September 1944, was characterized by the "leapfrogging" of air force units as they alternately occupied and abandoned airfields behind the front lines. The airfield construction policy following the breakout of the beach-head area called for tactical airfields in "clutches" of four or five airstrips, enough to provide room for the fighter groups of a tactical air command plus an air depot group.⁹

During this time of constant movement in late 1944, almost all new airfields built used PHS material. So swift was the allied offensive, however, that the airfields were almost out of effective range of the front before they were completed. To help overcome this situation, captured German airfields were cleared of mines and craters and repaired. In fact, it was found that German airfields could be rehabilitated and made operational sooner than airfields built on virgin sites.¹⁰

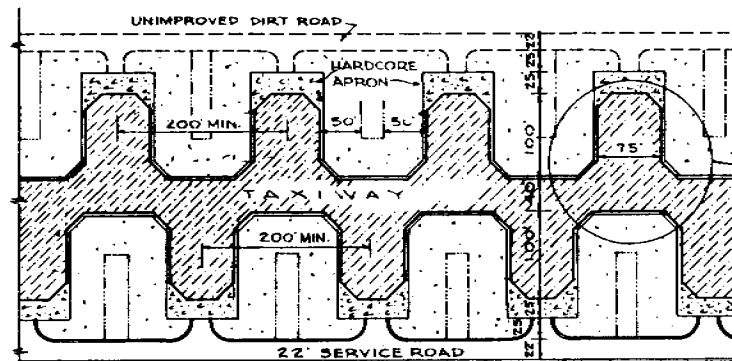

Another unforeseen development was the extraordinary demand for transport, supply, and evacuation fields as the Allied armies pushed past Paris toward the German frontier. In late 1944, supplies could not keep pace with General Eisenhower's forces, and to help lessen the supply shortage, 120 feet x 3,000+ feet airfields for C-47 planes became a priority (Figure 3). Bringing in ammo and gasoline, the C-47's on the return trip evacuated wounded to the rear.

By 15 September 1944, IX Engineer Command had placed over eighty air fields in operation, while British engineers had constructed seventy-six fields in their zone.¹¹ In Southern France, another twenty or so fields had been built by American engineers from the Mediterranean Theater of Operations (MTO). In October these uncoded MTO airfields were assigned to the ETO and given code numbers.

The stabilization of the front lines in Holland, Belgium, and eastern France in mid-September 1944, which would last into the new year, allowed aviation engineers a chance to reorganize and prepare for the upcoming winter season. As expected, they could not build new PHS and SMT strips during the fall rain and winter snow seasons because of the moist ground. Besides concrete, the American-made PSP was the only available surfacing material that could be laid down during this inclement weather in Europe. Selected airfields in Belgium and France were therefore "winterized" with PSP. Because of the limited supply of PSP, however, only a limited number of airfields could be winterized, making it necessary to base two group sized units per airfield.¹² But sufficient fighter-bomber and medium bomber airfields were completed that winter to ensure Ninth Air Force aircraft could continue flying combat missions.

The major problem affecting airfield construction in early 1945 was not the surprise German Ardennes counteroffensive (which caused the abandonment on only one airfield - Y-39, Hagenau). Rather, an early February thaw threatened to make airfields inoperable due to the mud and water. Using local civilian labor, engineers performed extensive maintenance on the threatened airfields and successfully resolved the crisis.¹³

The renewed allied offensive in early 1945, following the Battle of the Bulge, was supported in earnest by the building of tactical airfields in occupied Germany. Trier (Y-57), became the first operational tactical American airfield on German soil on 10 March 1945. When a crossing over the Rhine River was spearheaded at Remagen, Germany, a supply and evacuation strip was quickly set up to support the bridgehead. As Allied tank columns struck out rapidly into the heartland of Germany, the airfield "clutches" of the Ninth Air Force's tactical air commands moved east of the Rhine river within range of virtually any target in Germany.¹⁴ Scores of Luftwaffe sod and hard surfaced airfields were captured in the lightning advance, virtually undamaged, lessening the requirement for SMT, PHS, and PSP prefabricated surfacing. The relative lack of German military opposition in late March, April and May of 1945 lessened the need for close air support and produced a greater demand for supply strips to keep the offensive moving.¹⁵ Every opportunity was used to clear captured German airfields for use along the armies' route, allowing C-47's and other transports to land with food, gas, and ammunition. The supply effort received top airfield priority. By V-E Day, 9 May 1945, 76 of the 126 airfields made operational east of the Rhine river were strictly supply and evacuation fields.¹⁶

American engineers constructed or rehabilitated over 280 continental airfields in the ETO from D-Day to V-E Day (Figure 4, located at end of guide). In the summer months that followed, a few new airfields were constructed, but dozens more were abandoned. The airfield coding system remained in effect until after the Japanese surrender in the Pacific, when, on 14 September 1945, the system was officially discontinued. Thereafter, airfields were referenced by their geographic name.¹⁷

U.S. ARMY AIR FORCES CONTINENTAL AIRFIELD (ETO) LIST

This listing is divided into three parts. Part I, the numerical listing, includes all USAAF continental airfield codes. Part II, the alphabetical listing, includes official and alternative names of the airfields. Part III is a listing of British (B-) continental airfields as of 1 July 1945.

Explanation of terms:

Code No. The Army Air Forces code number assigned. Alternative codes appear in parenthesis.

NOTE: Some A-coded airfields initially carried C, N, or D suffixes to distinguish airfields with courier, night landing or air depot facilities respectively. (Example: A-21C, A-8N, A-9D). Additionally, Y-coded airfields were originally designated AY-coded airfields. These variations are not represented in the listings.

Airfield Name/Location. The official name of the airfield with the country of origin.

Airfield

Initial Op Date. The date the airstrip was declared operational for allied military use.

Date of Release. The date the airstrip was abandoned or released from USAAF control.

Combat Units Stationed/Date. USAAF combat units assigned to the airfield between 6 June 1944 to 9 May 1945. The primary units listed are combat groups. Squadrons are listed only when the squadron is assigned to an airfield different from its parent group. Units above the group level are not listed. If no major combat unit occupied the field, the type of field is given. Various French Air Force (FAF) and Royal Air Force (RAF) units that were assigned to these airfields are not listed.

The dates given were obtained from the official lineage and honors histories in Maurer Maurer's Air Force Combat Units of World War II and Combat Squadrons of the Air Force, World War II. Discrepancies were resolved by a check of the actual unit histories on file at the USAF Historical Research Center.

NOTE: Fighter, bomber, troop-carrier and reconnaissance groups and squadrons were stationed exclusively at letter coded airfields. Because liaison squadrons could operate out of short fields and on unprepared surfaces, they were not always stationed at a letter coded airfield. These uncoded "airfields" are not represented in the listing.
